Mammography

Mammography is a specialised x-ray technique for imaging the breasts. It is utilised both to screen for breast cancer, and to investigate breast symptoms such as a lump. The breasts are gently compressed in a specialised x-ray machine to help obtain a uniform thickness and cover as much tissue as possible. Usually two views are performed per breast.

The images are then reviewed by a radiologist. If there are any findings requiring closer inspection additional views may be performed.

It is our usual practice at Radiology SA to “double-read” mammograms. This means a second radiologist reviews your images, before the report is finalised. This provides an extra level of safety to minimise any risk of an abnormality being overlooked.
